Background

Zenix Metax didn’t come up fast — he came up everywhere.

From small underground shows and forgotten gymnasiums to half-lit halls where the crowd was closer than the ropes, Zenix learned early that survival in wrestling meant adaptability. No shortcuts. No hype machine. Just figuring it out one match at a time.

Now, standing inside CFW, Zenix sees something he’s never quite had before: a real proving ground. Not a promise — an opportunity.

He wrestles with respect, offers it freely, and expects it in return. But when it's not given, Zenix has no problem reminding opponents that respect can be taken just as easily as it's offered.

Inspired by the heart of Rey Mysterio and the work ethic of John Cena, Zenix doesn't try to outmuscle everyone in the room — he outthinks them. He studies match types. He adapts to environments. He treats the ring like a puzzle that needs solving.

And that's where The Prism comes in — one opponent, many angles.

Zenix hoists his opponent into a fireman's carry, transitions smoothly into a cartwheel, and uses the rotation to violently drive them down in one fluid, unexpected motion. Flashy, athletic — but above all, decisive.
